Read the following passage carefully and answer the questions that follows:

Saadawi wrote his novel in Arabic, and it has been translated into English by Jonathan Wright. Any time you read a work in translation, you must always keep in mind the fact that you are not reading the words the author wrote. Effective translation is a very difficult task, and even the very best translators (of whom Mr. Wright may very well be one!) cannot recreate the entirety of a literary work with all its nuances, implications and cultural information. Some words cannot be translated as single words, for instance, and must be replaced with a phrase. Humour may not be translated at all.

If you have access to a native speaker of the language in which a text was originally written, you could endeavor to engage in a discussion about a paragraph or more – say the opening of the novel – to see what the native speaker thinks about the quality of the translation, but you must, of course, deal with the text that you have in front of you, and you should treat it seriously as a work of literature in its own right. You can trust that a professional translator has got the story right, and that objects which appear in the translation appeared in the original. You can, therefore, trust that the symbols and allusions are intended, and so you can use them to form your understanding of the text. That being said, however, whenever you are working to understand a symbol or allusion in a text you are reading in translation, you must work to consider the interpretation from the perspective of the cultural context in which the author writes.
